

ABSTRACTS

study investigated 120 survivors of clinically confirmed myocardial infarctions. They were administered an Illness Behavior Questionnaire developed by Pilowsky, and also they reported state anxiety measures of fear, worry, anxiety, and intention. These measures were then broken down by marital status, education, and occupation. Results demonstrated that there was no significant difference in illness behavior attitudes due to marital status. Education, however, appears to be an important variable, those with the highest educational levels exhibiting greatest trust in their physicians. Occupational differences were measured by splitting the sample into blue-collar and white-collar occupations. Analysis of variance showed state anxiety dimensions significantly higher in blue-collar workers, as were the illness behavior dimensions of illness recognition and sick role acceptance. Age and years in present employment did not contaminate this positive finding. The authors feel that expressions of state anxiety are greater in blue collar workers due to the nature of their work situation, that is, when leaving the hospital many of them may have problems in continuing jobs that are often more physically strenuous than those of white-collar workers. Operationally, these findings may lead a coronary artery disease rehabilitation program to offer appropriate consultation on vocational opportunities to help allay anxiety induced from uncertainties about employment.
